Randomized controlled trial comparing single-dose and fractionated fluorouracil regimens in patients with advanced colorectal cancer. The optimal dose and schedule of fluorouracil in combination with leucovorin and oxaliplatin in advanced colorectal cancer is still being debated. A randomized phase III trial was designed to compare a single dose of fluorouracil (5-FU) plus leucovorin (LV) (5-FU/LV) with a fluorouracil infusion over 48 hours plus leucovorin (FU/LV) in terms of efficacy and toxicity. Patients with previously untreated metastatic colorectal cancer were randomized to either a single bolus dose of 5-FU (bolus arm, 1,000 mg/m<sup>2</sup>) or a continuous infusion of 5-FU (infusion arm, 425 mg/m<sup>2</sup>/48 hours) plus leucovorin (100 mg/m<sup>2</sup> bolus, followed by 20 mg/m<sup>2</sup>/48 hours). A total of 295 patients were randomized (153 bolus arm, 142 infusion arm). There were no differences in the main prognostic factors between the two arms. A higher proportion of patients achieved an objective response in the bolus arm (53% vs. 39%; P = 0.016), and a trend to a higher response rate was observed in the bolus arm in the subgroup of patients with liver metastases (61% vs. 39%; P = 0.054). Toxicity was similar in both arms, with the exception of a higher incidence of grade 3-4 leukopenia in the bolus arm (50% vs. 28%; P = 0.0005). The single-dose bolus regimen of 5-FU/LV is more effective than the infusion regimen of 5-FU/LV in advanced colorectal cancer. A critical but often overlooked component of the United States military's war against ISIS is the Kurdish Peshmerga, a force that the U.S. military has partnered with since the war began. Despite the fact that the Kurds are Sunni Muslim Arabs and that their primary adversary is the Shiite Muslim group ISIS, the U.S. has supported the Kurds with airstrikes, training, and equipment, including air defense systems. However, as Kurdish forces have moved forward and the U.S. has turned its attention
